For even the poet or writer with the best of intentions, the hardest part is always putting the pen to the paper and knowing where to start. Some days it will come easy, but most will not. This is the beauty of the newest release by Two Sylvia's Press, authored by Kelli Russell Agodon and Martha Silano. The Daily Poet: Day-By-Day Prompts For Your Writing Practice is a year of prompts that keep one fresh with a wellspring of starting points. If we don't start it isn't happening and this book can move one over that initial speed bump that often trips us up. Agodon and Silano are two seasoned writers, with seven books between them before they co-authored The Daily Poet. Both have received numerous accolades. Born of their own personal experiences of creating prompts for each other to write from, they have decided to provide us with a mountain of prompts to do the same. Enough for every day of the year. Reading through these prompts was a delight in itself. Some of these are a tribute to the creative genius in both of these women. The prompts are fun, witty, and sometimes deep or at least I've found myself searching deeply. The May 25th prompt: Taboo You implores us to write a poem that we would be afraid to show someone else because oh what it might reveal about ourselves or someone else that we are not 100% comfortable with others knowing. (No one has to see the results) - Prompts like this can take us places in our writing that we have been afraid to go. I find that a freeing experience.
